Dugald Stewart Walker

In a selection of "Fairy Tales From Hans Christian Andersen," illustrated by Dugald Stewart Walker (Doubleday, Page & Co.), may be found abundant evidence of the development and growth into a mature and rare form of art expression, which the earlier talent of the young artist, formerly of Richmond, had prepared, not only his friends and those interested in his career, but the unbiased connoisseurs, to expect and to predict of him when he should have attained the full measure of his artistic stature. For particularly charming, fascinating, indeed in the literal sense of the word—are the pictures that Mr. Walker has provided for the old tales—pictures that place him at once among the foremost of American decorative illustrators. In his black and white work there is, naturally, some resemblance to the modern English school, whose product almost invariably shows traces of the influence of Aubrey Beardsley. The inspiration of that queer genius seems to appear in Mr. Walker's illustrations for "The Flying Trunk"; there is in them a suggestion of the mature Beardsley style. But whatever debt we may owe to the masters of decorative technique, his pictures are distinctly his own. For, no less than the artist's little stories, which the publishers have added to the volume, his designs show an imagination at once marvelously fertile and altogether wholesome. The wonderfully painstaking care that Mr. Walker has lavished on all his drawings is amply repaid in the beauty of his achievement. Often there is a wealth of detail that must have claimed days of close application, yet the artist invariably contrives to produce a result not at all labored. Especially is this true of the delightful drawings for the second and fourth stories of "The Snow Queen." The compositions are simple and the result so altogether charming that one is scarcely aware of the hundreds of carefully placed little lines with which it is obtained. The color pictures show much the same qualities as the black and white designs and in the use of a splendid sense of the possibilities of color used for decorative effect. In some of these one might wish for a more a trifle more strongly defined, but that is a fault lacking in the work of a most beautiful picture, but it seems that, in a measure, the detail of which Mr. Walker is so prodigal is lost. However, this may be as he intended. Certainly the pictures are charming; rich and gorgeous, some of them; others more delicately tinted. One of the most delightful designs in the book is that used for the lining paper. A simple drawing in the quaint fancy of the artist described in one of his own stories. The head and tall pieces and the cover picture, in rich autumn tints, all contribute to the beauty of the volume, which is not only an ideal gift book—particularly for the holiday season—but, as a work of art, is worthy of place among the beautiful things and books in one's own collection. Mr. Walker's success will be exceedingly gratifying to his own friends and to those of his family; he is a son of the late Major David N. Walker, sometime commander of the Otoy Battery of the Army of Northern Virginia.

Few books of fiction may truly be described as "delicious." Yet the word most aptly and fairly indicates the quality of "The Pastor's Wife" (Doubleday, Page & Co.), by the anonymous author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." Like the author's best known book, "The Pastor's Wife" contains an intimate study and transcription of life in Prussia, though it has its beginning in London, in Regent Street, indeed, for its heroine, afterwards the pastor's wife, is the daughter of an English bishop, in spite of her Norse name of Ingeborg. Her mother sent her up from the episcopal palace to London to have her teeth attended to in Harley Street, of course. They had expected that the painful process would occupy at least ten days, so when, after the extraction of one tooth, the dentist declared that nothing more was necessary to be done, Ingeborg had about nine days on her hands, besides something a little less than £10 in her pocket. Her eye is caught by an attractive poster, advertising seven days in Lucerne for seven guineas, and Ingeborg simply runs away. The trip is described with the author's persuasive and persuasive humor—no one can help laughing at the account—but during its progress Ingeborg meets her fate. It is personified in Herr Dremmel, pastor of a parish in East Prussia. He is an abstracted, concentrated student, chiefly of fertilizers, to which he devotes all the time that he can steal away from his parochial duties. But he is also Teutonically thorough, so Ingeborg cannot escape him. She marries him and goes to his country estate. Then follows a chapter after chapter of humorous narration—humorous in spite of its very apparent reality to the truth in its portrayal of life and in spite of its romantic coloring of the German point of view, concerning woman and her duties to "Kinder, Kirche, Kueche." Most of the book deals with Ingeborg's life in relation to her husband and her position as a woman, though a touch of romance threatens to cause a complication for a while; does cause it, indeed, but Ingeborg's innocence and her Prussian husband's stolidity bear them both safely over the crisis. As a study, "The Pastor's Wife" is genuinely significant; as a novel, it is clever, if not brilliant, extremely amusing, and, as has been said—altogether delicious.

"Innocent: Her Fancy and His Fate" (George H. Doran Co.) is a truly Correllian romance from the pen of Marie Corelli. It is a story, a romance, a love story, with all the sweetness, sadness, pathos and soulfulness that we have learned to look for from the author when she devotes herself to the telling of a sweet tragedy. Innocent is a tender young heroine of the old homestead, which she learns to her shame, is not her old homestead at all, because her escutcheon is blurred by a bar not unknown to heraldry. When she learns of this, she goes to London and takes her father's name, though without informing the world why, and there she develops a wonderful gift and becomes a great novelist. But a painter—oh, these painters!—trides with her, and she suffers and just keeps on suffering till the end. And the end is sad, as it should be. But the book will be widely popular, because it is so sweet and so sad.

It is a grown-up May Iverson who now appears in the latest story from the pen of Elizabeth Jordan, "May Iverson's Career" (Harper), and the story of her adventures after leaving the convent will be interesting, therefore, to grown people, as well as to girls not yet grown. The love story of May binds together all twelve chapters of the book, which, otherwise, might be taken as a collection of stories concerning the heroine. During her last year at the convent May had determined to become a nun, but her father persuades her to try her hand at newspaper work for at least three years before obeying the call of what she considers her vocation. She agrees, and it is the account of her experiences and adventures that forms the vivid tale of "May Iverson's Career."

"Undoubtedly," says the Senator in Samuel G. Blythe's "The Fakers" (Doubleday, Page & Co.), "Mr. Lincoln was right when he said that you cannot fool all the people all the time, but the limit has been reached yet." A large number of men in the politics of this country have been at that business of fooling the people for a great many years, and haven't been caught yet. Such speeches as the foregoing, with proper corresponding "business," as the actors call the movements and actions that accompany the delivery of their lines, make Mr. Blythe's new story one of the keenest and most amusing satires upon political life in this country that we have known. Having been on the very inside of things political for many years, yet having remained a close and amused observer and not a participant, Mr. Blythe is probably better qualified to write a story of this character than any man in America. Further, his style is so witty, so clean-cut and so convincing that even an ordinary story would be entertaining if told by him. Content and style taken together make his story of the young provincial lawyer, nursed and groomed by a cynical old master of the game into a full-blown cynic of the "pull," not only diverting to a high degree, but illuminating and instructive to the reader. The story is a satire of the spellbinder as though it sounded the warning of a prophet and the wisdom of an oracle.

The Virginia State Library has just issued a bulletin of 220 pages on maps relating to Virginia. The bulletin, which has been compiled by the assistant librarian, Earl G. Swen, contains the titles of the manuscript and printed maps relating to Virginia in the Virginia State Library. In the archives of the Virginia Corporation for the Survey of the State, in the Auditor's office, and in the files of the Virginia Geological Survey, it includes also a complete set of the titles of Virginia maps of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries from the large collection in the Library of Congress, some manuscript maps belonging to the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, together with others in the Congressional Museum, the Library of the Virginia Historical Society, and the Library of the United States Military Academy at West Point. Notes have been added in the appendix concerning Virginia maps in the following collections: Wisconsin State Historical Society; United States Engineer Office, Richmond; United States Engineer Office, Washington; United States Engineer Office, Norfolk; Virginia Historical Society; Richmond; Virginia State Highway Commission; United States Post Office, Department, Washington; and Public Record Office, London (McDonald's list, 1851). In general, the plan has been to catalogue maps which relate to the territory in the present State of Virginia through April, 1814; and those relating to West Virginia through 1863, the latter some of those which illustrate the different boundaries and claims in the Colonial period. The titles of both general and local maps appear in the catalogue. When a map is not in the Virginia State Library, the title follows the title giving its location.

COMPRESSION OF COTTON FORBIDDEN TO RAILROAD

No service "Connected With Transportation" and It Goes Under Ban of Commission.

WASHINGTON, November 20.—A new principle was laid down by the Interstate Commerce Commission to-day, when it held in the case of numerous cotton merchants against the Atlantic Coast Line, that the "compression of export cotton at the port of transportation is not a service rendered by the owner of the property transported which is 'connected with such transportation by the rail carrier, and that the carrier must cease from making allowance for such compression." Under the Coast Line's tariff, cotton may be compressed and compression paid by the carrier at Athens, Atlanta, Macon, Covington and Augusta, Ga., and other points on the Georgia Railroad, or the cotton may be moved uncompressed to the ports of Norfolk, Wilmington, Charleston and Savannah, there compressed and payment for such compression made by the Coast Line. Allowances also are made for compression of cotton moving from points in North and South Carolina and Virginia to the ports named. In its decision, the commission says:
"The compression service rendered at the port by the owners of the cotton for which the railroad pays is performed after the transportation is completed in so far as the railroad is concerned, and after its responsibilities in connection with the shipment are at an end. The services rendered is, therefore, in no sense 'connected with the transportation,' and such being the circumstance, it is plain that there is no authority in this commission to establish any charge for such service; and it can but follow, therefore, that there is no warrant in law for such allowance."

Kills Himself in Hotel.
[Special to The Times-Dispatch.]
LANCHBURG, Va., November 20.—Edward L. Jones, aged twenty-one years, formerly of Amherst County, committed suicide in his room in the Hotel Carroll some time last night by shooting himself in the right temple with a .32-calibre revolver. Despondency, probably due to the young man being out of employment, is thought to have been the reason for the suicide. The body will be taken to Amherst for burial.

Borrows Pistol to Kill Himself.
[Special to The Times-Dispatch.]
WINNIEBETTER, Va., November 20.—Borrowing a revolver from a neighbor, saying he wanted to shoot a rabbit, George Stover, fifty-five years old, a prominent resident of Strasburg, went to a secluded place near Shenandoah River and blew out his brains, dying this afternoon in a hospital. Ill health depressed him.

Hotel Carroll some time last night by shooting himself in the right temple with a .32-calibre revolver. Despondency, probably due to the young man being out of employment, is thought to have been the reason for the suicide. The body will be taken to Amherst for burial.

CAN'T PRAISE CARDUI ENOUGH

This Lady Was Very Nervous, On Account of Serious Womanly Trouble. But Now She Praises Cardui.

Murphycross, Ala.—The following is from Mrs. W. J. Daugherty, this place: "I will write a full statement of my condition before I had taken Cardui. I was very weak. I had not any nerve at all, and could not stand any noise, and had female complaints."

At last my doctor told me to try Cardui, and I did so, and I can say it sure has cured me sound and well, and I am glad to tell any one what it did for me, and it will help any suffering woman.

I can't praise Cardui enough. I wish every woman would believe what I say and give Cardui a trial, and they will find my word to be true.

Cardui is all I take in the way of medicine. We always keep it in the house for my benefit.

When I was told to try Cardui I did not think I would, but my friends kept on at me until I got one bottle, and it did me so much good that I kept on taking it.

My back has got well, my nerve is all right and my old tired feeling has gone, and I am stout and strong as a woman can be. I am glad to say it was Cardui that I can praise to my health.

Your druggist sells Cardui. Try it.—Advertisement.
